I am trying to get a handle on all of the issues with alcohol use. Part of the reason I am trying to grasp the issues is to see if anyone has come up with an alternative that would be safer/better. Specifically: I know that alcohol use is a hot topic, and it's not just about whether it's easier to drink. I'd love to have my head read at parties, and not have to worry about embarrassing accidents while picking up a friend. The more I look into it, the more I begin to wonder if someone has thought of something that would be much safer and less problematic. When considering what type of drug might be safer than alcohol, how could I go about coming up with something that would create the best benefit/safest possible outcome for the user, and be something that would actually be willing to make the market? For example, people have a terrible time with erectile dysfunction and drugs that cause many adverse reactions. Alcohol use, and the potential for addiction, is known to be a huge problem. Drugs such as Ritalin that for awhile were popular, are notorious for their addictability to teens. What would it take to get a new drug to market that would be safer than alcohol? A: My concern is, it's entirely possible to come up with a drug that is safer than alcohol, and not any safer than the "addictive" drugs that have been introduced into the market that have been linked to addiction. Here's what I imagine, as someone who's had a genuine experience with the science of addiction: The drug that we have been placing into the "public sphere" has, for the most part, been addictive because we make the drug as expensive as possible (so we can sell as much as possible, and keep and/or gain more market share) and, the research has been done on teens that are using it. As such, we have the approval of putting the drug in the market. (Or, we have an approved research protocol that shows that our drug is safe and effective at treating certain types of addictions). With that info
